James,

Here is the conundrum:

The proposal says:

a) A person with specific intent to abandon his current location at a fixed date in the future has not established the requisite intent for the purposes of establishing domicile.

So...I figure the governor must abandon his residence ("current location") at a date certain in the future (when his term ends), and therefore, does not have domicile (per this definition), and therefore, is not a qualified voter, and therefore, must abandon the office of governor, and no future governor may ever take residence in the governor's mansion without immediately abdicating the position. The same holds true for our retiring president of UVa.

Am I missing something? This may be a bit tongue in cheek, but only a bit.
